Idol Threat

Sound and Vision

My record company told me to never, ever sing live again. They just wanted me to lip-synch for the rest of my life.

With famous parents, Josie Ho could have just screwed around Macau, Hong Kong, the U.S., and Canada. Instead, she followed her interests in music and film. And now, instead of becoming part of Hong Kong's idol-making machine, she's playing real rock 'n' roll with the punk band Hardpack and choosing challenging roles in indie flicks like Butterfly and art movies like The Exiled. During her latest stop in Los Angeles, where she was in talks with various Hollywood-types, we visited her family apartment.

GR: Where did you grow up?
JH: I grew up in Hong Kong and Toronto. I spent my childhood and teenage years in Toronto, in two boarding schools. I loved boarding school. You have a lot of freedom and you get to be responsible.

GR: Were you in bands or plays or whatnot when you were a kid?
JH: Yeah, I was in plays. I got to be Evita's sister-in-law. I wasn't involved in a band, but we had a lot of talent shows and I remember we had Amnesty concerts. I was always imitating Madonna. I was a freak. I wanted to be Madonna. I dreamed about being a singer when I was 11 or 12. My sisters hung out with Chinese pop stars like Andy Lau and Leslie Cheung. I saw these guys partying and singing and the time. I didn't see the hard work behind everything—just the glamorous, fun part of it—and I was fascinated. My family knew, and they had me perform at their private parties.

GR: No way!
JH: Yeah, my parents always have parties, where they hired a keyboard person and they'd sing. At the time, we didn't have KTV clubs. Before getting drunk, everyone would be shy, and they'd be like, "Josie! Why don't you go up and sing!"

GR: Did you sing Cantonese or Hong Kong style pop back then, or were you into rock 'n' roll?
JH: I was really into Madonna and pop music like Lenny Kravitz and Prince. Now I'm into rock 'n' roll because of (her husband) Conroy's influence. I became friends with him and he started showing me different music like Patience and D'Angelo.

GR: On your last album, there's a lot of stuff that's really band-oriented. What were your early albums like?
JH: Record companies were like, "You have to do seven dance music songs and three ballads." So I did that.

GR: Did you not dance because a make-over girl did that?

Sweet Josie Ho
